The need to find somebody. The need to work for somebody. The need to make money. The need to land a job.

A job description is a description of an unknown future. It is a hopeful advertisement of a future that can become reality. Yet, in today's market, this need is scarce, a frustration of reality, a frustration of the future.

In his new novel, "Looking for Someone," Todd Van Buskirk appropriated hundreds of job descriptions from his employer's job site to create a meditation on the need to find somebody to work in today's world. These descriptions are interested in a person's skill, but not the soul. Therefore, these descriptions are lamentations, and sad lyrical statements of a perceived loss.
