ABOUT THE AUTHOR

Jeremy Ben Royston is the pen name of Jeremy Boulter. He was brought up in a family which whose father, Royston Boulter, was a lapsed Anglican, leaning towards atheism, and whose mother was a devote Roman Catholic. The author often found himself, therefore, with a dilemma on his hands. By his late teens, he was unable to accept the Church as the authority on religion, or the concept of a man who lived on earth being God. This eventually led him to try out many different cults and religions until one day, he encountered the Quran. It was just a few short steps from reading that amazing book to embracing the only religion that made sense to him. From there, he has explored different areas of his religion and written several articles on it. This book evolved out of an article his first partner in the faith, a Muslimah, Sister Jamila, drafted when discussing dietary law on an internet forum.

The Dietary Laws of God

Diet is a subject of taboo in many religions, and both Judaism and Islam have strict laws about lawful and prohibited foods. In Judaism, what food is lawful, and what food can be eaten with what, and how food is prepared all come under the label of kosher cuisine, whilst Islamic rules of diet are known as halal cuisine. Christianity, however, has largely dispensed with any limitations on what can be eaten, and how it is cooked, largely because the churches teach that the law of Jesus is through the heart and spirit; the intention rather than following rote legal niceties. This book critically examines the Christian reasons for abandoning God's dietary Law, and calls the God fearing back to not only observing it, but embracing the true religion that God has sent to man down the ages of mankind.
